JOSEPH CONRAD'S LITERARY MANUSCRIPTS

INTRODUCTION

“For the textual scholar preparing a critical edition and for those interested in learning more about Conrad’s compositional methods and shaping imagination, the discovery of autograph and typewritten manuscripts and other early draft versions is of the utmost importance.” With these words Gordon Lindstrand opened his “Bibliographical Survey of the Literary Manuscripts of Joseph Conrad,” which appeared in three consecutive numbers of the second volume of Conradiana in 1969-70. Lindstrand compiled his survey as a first step towards what he hoped would eventually become a virtually complete and reliable record of the current disposition of all documents relating to the production or revision of Conrad’s literary works. This new Register is meant as a second step, supplementing Lindstrand’s findings with additional information on proofs and other materials relevant to the pre-publication history of Conrad’s works, and tracing where possible the provenance of the surviving documents.

Conrad’s early drafts and working papers would have gone straight from his hands into the fire had it not been for his wife, Jessie Conrad, who tucked them away in the deep and “sacred” drawers of an old yellow press. In 1911, once Agnes Tobin had introduced him to the New York lawyer and collector John Quinn, Conrad realized that his manuscripts and typescripts could provide a badly needed supplement to his literary earnings. Still, he found it difficult to believe in the value of his own superseded scribbblings, especially those in incomplete or “unclean” or typed form: fragments of “Heart of Darkness,” Lord Jim, and Nostromo were sold for £100, and substantial typescripts for as little as £5. Virtually all of the contents of the sacred drawers were in Quinn’s possession by 1918, when Conrad began offering new drafts (usually typescripts, since by this time Conrad was dictating his works) to the London collector T. J. Wise, with handwritten title-pages designed to certify their authenticity. When Quinn sold his vast collections in November 1923, the Conrad items were the most profitable of all, and Quinn realized a profit of some 1,000% on his investment.

The fact that Conrad had only two collectors during his lifetime simplifies the disposition of his manuscripts and makes it easier to trace their dispersal. Most of the items in Quinn's collection are now in the collections of various American university libraries, and most of Wise's treasures are in the Ashley collection at the British Library. A small, diminishing number of items are still in private hands, while others remain "overdue and missing."

Gordon Lindstrand's survey is also overdue for a major revision and update. His survey contained a total of 203 numbered entries, of which 59 (or 29%) were of "unknown" or "uncertain" location. The present register lists 331 numbered entries, of which 33 (or 10%) are unlocated.

Anyone who attempts to compile such a list soon realizes that many of the descriptive terms used by auction houses, cataloguers, and scholars are at best only approximations: "quarto" and "folio" as applied to manuscripts mean little more than "small-ish" as against "large-ish"; confusions abound between "pages" and "leaves"; and the notion of "proofs" often includes not only galley or page proofs but also tear-sheets and disbound volumes. Still, the hope is that this Register will help scholars to identify and locate documents essential for understanding the textual history of Conrad's works, and stimulate the search for items yet unlocated. The information presented here is minimal where excellent catalogues are readily available (such as T. A. J. Burnett's British Library Catalogue of the Ashley Manuscripts), but additional details are provided for the unlocated items. Bibliographical references are limited to materials that refer directly to the history or description of these documents, and not to interpretations of their texts.

In the following list, numbers are assigned only to documents that were written, dictated, corrected, or at least initialled by Conrad. To save space, a number of abbreviations have been used. The numbered items in Lindstrand's survey are cross-referenced here as "L-numbers." Standard abbreviations are used for journals and for Conrad's major works; other, less common abbreviations are identified in a list at the end of this Register.
